This study evaluated the impact of HCl and CO₂ on the spectroscopic properties of poly(vinyl chloride) (PVC) dispersions used as binders of plasticized polyvinyl chloride (PVDF) sheets. These dispersions are composed of PVC, vinyl chloride monomer, and a small quantity of PVC-ethylene copolymer. Spectral analyses were conducted on PVC particles as well as dispersions and dissolved polymers to determine (1) the extent of particle dissolution and (2) spectral changes due to the presence of hydrogen chloride and carbon dioxide. Carbon dioxide caused only partial dissolution of PVC particles, and the dissolution process was fastest at high concentration and slowest at low. Hydrogen chloride caused the most dissolution of particles, but the extent was moderate. Spectral analyses of dissolved polymers indicated that hydrogen chloride caused simple swelling of the polymers without significant changes in the intensity of the bands. In contrast, carbon dioxide appeared to interact strongly with the polymers, causing spectral changes in the absorbance and FT-IR spectra of polymers and particles. Both gases reduced the intensity of the absorbance bands in the region of CH stretching bands of the polymers. Carbon dioxide produced more spectral effects in the CH stretching region of the polymer than hydrogen chloride. The extent of spectral changes in both gases was most pronounced at high concentrations. The present invention relates to a printing method and a printing apparatus employing the method which enable one to carry out a printing operation with high quality even when a recording material is a recycled paper. Recently, recording sheets such as a recycled paper or the like can be used in printing apparatus. The reason why the recycled paper is used in the printing apparatus is that unlike plain paper, the recycled paper has various properties such as low ink absorbing property, uniform paper surface or the like. Accordingly, the printing apparatus employing the recycled paper sometimes encounters a problem of fluctuations of printing quality caused by differences in the sheet quality of the recycled paper. In general, the recycled paper is obtained by cleaning with
